WHAT IS 1787?

1787 National Committee is a new American political party seeking to change the way American politics works—not simply change who's in charge.

The organization challenges the limitations of the entrenched two-party system and proposes a fundamentally different political model that combines meaningful political competition, principled leadership, and comprehensive, long-term governing.

1787 does not exist to protect a party establishment or demand ideological conformity. The intention is to offer something different: a new generation of leaders who put principle before party, problem-solving before partisanship, and the will of the people before the will of a political machine.

WHAT MAKES 1787 DIFFERENT?

More Meaningful Political Competition: 1787 believes changing the way politics is played requires opening the political process to more voices, more ideas, and more meaningful choices—not simply alternating power between two established parties.

A Higher Standard of Leadership: 1787 advocates leadership grounded in honesty, integrity, transparency, intellectual discipline, and civility, with respect for the dignity, rights, and liberties of every American, regardless of political affiliation, background, or personal beliefs.

A Comprehensive Approach to Governing: Rather than addressing national challenges in isolation, 1787 proposes coordinated policies designed to work together as part of a long-term national strategy.

An Open Policy Process: Its 150-plus policy proposals are intended as a substantive starting point for scrutiny, discussion, and improvement—not an inflexible ideological platform.

A Presidential Cabinet Announced Before Election Day: 1787 intends to identify the individuals its presidential candidate would nominate for every Cabinet position before the 2028 presidential election. This approach would give voters an opportunity to evaluate not only the candidate and proposed policies, but also the people who would help lead the country and implement its national strategy. 1787 believes Americans deserve to know as much as possible about the administration they are being asked to elect.

WHY THE NAME 1787?

In 1787, courageous patriots gathered at the Constitutional Convention to reimagine how their young nation would be governed. America's founders did not simply accept the existing structure because it was familiar. They recognized its shortcomings, challenged established assumptions, and undertook the extraordinary task of designing something better. The result was a remarkable framework for self-government—one with the capacity to endure, adapt, and evolve.

Their achievement was extraordinary, but the work of creating a more perfect union was only beginning. The original Constitution reflected profound limitations of its era, including the accommodation of slavery and the exclusion of much of the population from meaningful political participation. Over generations, Americans have worked to confront those injustices, expand the promise of liberty and equality, and strengthen the nation the founders established.

Today, 1787 seeks to carry forward that same spirit of courage, imagination, and determination—not to return America to the eighteenth century, but to embrace the responsibility of improving its political institutions for the future.

The founders of the United States did not finish the work of creating a more perfect union. They began it. And 1787 believes every generation has a responsibility to honor what they built, protect what makes America extraordinary, and strengthen our nation for generations to come.
